Not illustrated. 1821 Excerpt: . one, and which had taken up 41 grains, was now slowly evaporated in a glass vessel over a lamp. Beautiful cubic crystals soon appeared; the whole was evaporated to dryness in order to examine this salt, which with the usual tests, unnecessary here to repeat, was found to be wholly muriat of soda or common salt. The last or third solution, which consisted of 25 grains, taken up by the distilled vinegar, was next examined to discover whether it consisted wholly or in part of carbonat of lime, or wholly or in part of carbonat of magnesia; for this purpose it was evaporated slowly till a viscid mass was obtained, which could not be brought to crystallize, and which was deliquescent. This residuum not only showed the properties of acetat of lime, but also of magnesia; it was accordingly converted into an aqueous solution, and the whole of the lime thrown down, by converting iiito a selenite with a few drops of sulphuric acid. The precipitate thus formed, was dried and weighed, when I found it to weigh 25 grains; now as, according to Bergman, 100 parts of gypsum contains 34 of pure lime, or what is nearly equal, to 62 of carbonat of lime, the state in which of course it must have existed in the mineral water, the 25 grains which we have here obtained is equivalent to about 15 grains of carbonat of lime. The remainder, when evaporated, produced perfect crystals of...
